(Continued From Page One) Khan's contention is that cost alone is not an adequate measuring stick for health planning. In Winchendon's case, for instance, a closing would knock at least 75 persons out of work and mean those without a private car would be severely isolated from medical services

Khan also took the agency to task for using area population projections developed by UMass rather than those of the MRPC

About 250 persons attended a hearing in Gardner last week to raise objections to the recommendations, and Khan said he would be following the extent to which they made any difference in the CMHSA's final decision.

He said by law the health planners are supposed to take into account what the public says and that in fact an "advisory council" for this area does exist.

"What they are saying might be very justified, but I do not believe a total analysis has been gone through," he said.

There had been a figure given, however, when the report was released earlier this month, saying cutting pediatrics beds in the North County — from 68 to 44 — could save up to $1.5 million per year in present costs.

This is because, Higgins has said, to maintain an empty bospital bed costs anywhere from 50 to 60 per cent of the cost of maintaining one with a

The task force report had also recommended that the pediatrics unit be eliminated from Clinton Hospital and that Heywood Memorial Hospital in Gardner cut its pediatrics beds from 29 to 12.

The final version of the acute care and pediatrics recom-mendations is expected to be acted on by the CMHSA board of directors late in October.

In a special meeting with the In a special meeting with the Wastewater Treatment Committee and state and local officials Wednesday, Daniel J. Coughiln of the construction grants division of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) proposed the commission have Camp, Dresser and McKee (CDM), its engineering firm, work out a settlement with Nichols Engineering and Research Firm, the suppliers of the unit.

When the unit was installed in July, 1973, a granular standard was used. However in March, 1974 a new standard was an-nounced. The federal govern-ment wanted that standard to apply to incinerators bought between July and March. Trying to comply with the standard, the commission issued a change order to Nichols Engineering. The commission contends that the firm failed to meet the new qualifications. Nichols believes if the unit burns the amount of sludge it was designed for, it will meet the federal requirments. The engineers will be asked to work with CDM to see what capital would be needed to upgrade the unit. Once that is done, Coughlin said he would "entertain a request" for money to bring the incinerator to the stricter requirement.

Before any course of action

Before any course of action was decided, the commission offered other alternatives to the EPA. Asking if 90 per cent of the sludge be disposed of through agricultural and landfill means and the incinerator be used just for "emergency" purposes, the commission wanted to know if a moratorium could be reached on upgrading the unit.

Sam Silverman of the en-forcement division of the EPA said the only way a waiver could be granted would be for the use of "innovative technology." He said using the incinerator on an emergency basis did not qualify for a waiver.

Because there were federal water pollution monies available in 1973, treatment plants in the New England plants in the New England states were coming out to bid. Edmund G. Benoit of the Central Massachusetts Air Pollution Control Division, told the commission the city of Fitchburg is not the only community having trouble complying with federal standards.
